

Chapter 4

Effective Communication

Communication is the transfer of spoken or written information, thoughts or ideas to create an understanding between a sender and a receiver.

Effective communication implies that the transmitted content has been received and understood by the receiver in a manner that was intended by the sender.

Goal of effective communication

Establishing trust and understanding, changing behaviour, and acquiring information are the goals of effective communication.

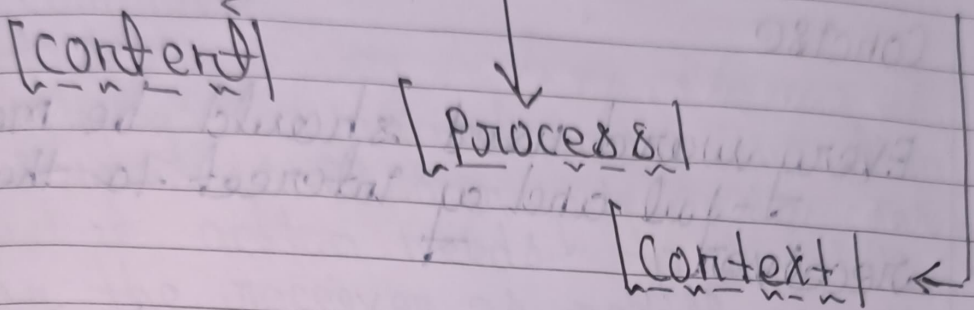

Anything that interferes with communication and makes it ineffective.

Principles of Effective Communication

1. Simple language: The language and words used in communication should be simple and understandable by both the sender and the receiver.
2. Definite: The communication should be definite.
3. Complete and concise: The information provided in the communication should be complete and to the point.
4. Appropriate medium: A proper medium of communication should be used.
5. Authentic: Information given should be factual.
6. Courteous: The sender should be polite and courteous while communicating.

Factors of Effective Communication

The 7 C's of Effective Communication

1. Clear

- The message can be conveyed effectively if the sender has clarity in his thoughts.

2. Concise

- Every word used should be meaningful and of interest to the receiver.
- Short and brief message should be used to maintain the receiver's attention.

3. Concrete

- The message should be supported by facts and figures to eliminate any doubt in the receiver's mind.

4. Correct

- Correct language, grammar, vocabulary and sentence construction should be used.

5. Coherent

Check if the message is organised logically and has smooth flow and a proper sequence.

6. Complete

Usually in formal communication, the sender is also required to convey what action needs to be taken by the receiver as result of the conversation.

7. Courteous

The feelings and views of the receiver along with his knowledge, experience and age, must be considered.

It shows the respect for the receiver.

The receiver should be addressed in a friendly and courteous manner by using respectful terms or gestures.

Benefits of Effective Communication :-

- It reduces misunderstanding & and prevents us from overlooking important information.
- It can also protect people from embarrassment or awkwardness because of wrong assumptions.
- It allows to build trust.
- Remove negative emotions.
- It improves relationship with others.